However, using fossil fuels to generate electricity not only produces greenhouse gases, but also emits radioactive materials. Environmental problems are also associated with nuclear power, due to large quantities of radioactive materials and by-products. Development of a novel electricity-generating technology, including solar cells, windmills, fuel cells, and microbial fuel cells (MFCs), has been sought. As a technology for generating electricity using hydrogen as a fuel, in particular, MFCs have attracted attention as a possible solution to these problems (Electrochemistry, vol. 94, 2010, pp. 8-18). In particular, MFCs have attracted attention as a technology for generating electricity by utilizing the chemical energy contained in water directly, and for this reason, they are considered to be the most promising technology in future. To date, MFCs have mainly been used for chemical reactions that generate electricity in the field of chemical industry. It is reported that MFCs generate electricity at a high current density of 10 mA/cm² or higher, which is much higher than the current density of a conventional fuel cell (e.g., around 1 mA/cm²) (Energy Conversion and Management, vol. 45, 2002, pp. 1-9). Therefore, MFCs can be expected to generate electricity at a high current density even in a natural environment, thus enabling the possibility of utilizing the generated electricity. In the MFC, hydrogen generated through various reactions in water can be utilized as a fuel, and electrons generated through
