After all of that, go to settings > security > and set it to 'permanently deny installation from unknown sources' and it should work just fine. In the final paragraphs of his new book he makes a major move to put more fire in the manner in which other prominent voices of the country have wanted a revolution. But does it go far enough? In the final paragraphs of his new book he makes a major move to put more fire in the manner in which other prominent voices of the country have wanted a revolution. But does it go far enough? In the last chapter of his new book, "Blood on the Moon: The Assassination of President Kennedy," Philip Jones examines the vast array of theories about what motivated the assassins Lee Harvey Oswald and Jack Ruby to kill John F. Kennedy. Jones posits that the real "Kennedy Conspiracy" is one in which conspiracy-minded conservatives have been laying the groundwork for some sort of an illicit action against the Democrat for decades. Jones argues that there have been a number of cranks who have claimed they knew about the assassination beforehand and that the real motive was not related to the Cuban Missile Crisis, but rather the fact that JFK wanted to advance policies that went against the grain of the Conservative movement. Over the decades, Jones suggests that many of the ideas proposed by "conspiracy theorists" have come to pass. "Over the past 50 years, some conservative groups and media have spent considerable energy — and not a little money — trying to ensure that the president's legacy is a sordid one. If you look at the list of 'truths' that the conspiracy theorists have announced over the years, they have most of them come to pass," Jones writes. "Since the crisis of the Cuban Missile Crisis, conservative Americans have become increasingly concerned about communism," Jones continues. "In the 1950s, it was the threat of nuclear war, as in the 1950s, a Communist Cuba was an imminent threat." Jones's theory seems to make a great deal of sense.
