Beyond Extraordinary Productivity! Increasing Productivity is All We Are About! Why is it so important to increase productivity? Simple! Human life is too short to have to worry about time-consuming and unproductive tasks. This is how we have become slaves to the daily grind. However, modern technologies now allow us to work and exercise without being so prone to burnout. What exactly is productivity? Just as productivity is not the same as busyness, it is not the same as being busy. Productivity is the level of output that can be achieved per unit of time. It is time in relation to the value that the task produces. Productivity is about saving time and creating value. Value is an emotional term and it is important to focus on creating a business model that is well received by people. If you do this, then productivity will be easy to achieve. You may consider using a method of productivity called ‘the 80/20 rule’ in which you concentrate your efforts on what is important and leave the rest for others. In other words, if you identify your top 20 tasks, outsource the rest. By outsourcing, I mean you find someone you trust to perform those tasks on your behalf. This frees up your time to focus on the things that truly add value to your business. A common misconception among entrepreneurs is that they need to start with the most important project and work their way down the list. This is a mistake because this methodology usually means you will spend too much time trying to complete a project which is not going to be of much value to your clients. So, how do you calculate productivity? It is important to find the most valuable activities to automate first and then automate them and then automate them until they are no longer an essential task. For example, if you are a photographer, don’t spend 20 hours creating a website – find a website builder that automates this process for you. There are now cloud-based tools and services that do an excellent job ba244e880a
