Traumatic dislocations of the shoulder may occur in association with fractures of the scapula, clavicle, humeral head, and acromioclavicular joint. The American Academy of Orthopaedic Surgeons recommends that a CT scan be performed on all patients with displaced proximal humerus fractures. In the event of an open injury to the shoulder and dislocation of the humeral head, an initial shoulder CT scan should be obtained to assess the degree of fracture complexity. If the humeral head is displaced, dislocation of the shoulder, and the patient's health status are such that he or she is a candidate for operative reduction, it is appropriate to perform an arthrogram, which may provide sufficient information to guide operative treatment. The arthrogram should be performed after the initial shoulder CT scan, as the former serves as a reference point for the latter. If there is not a dislocation of the shoulder or the patient is not a candidate for operative reduction, then a shoulder radiograph should be obtained. This report describes the indications, advantages, and disadvantages of each of the imaging modalities currently available for evaluating the shoulder and addressing issues related to trauma and associated injuries.Q.
