I've been to enough funerals and memorial services to know that when you lose a loved one you don't really get a second chance. You don't get to say, "I'm sorry, but I can't forgive you for taking someone away from me." You do get a long view. You're supposed to mourn for a period of time, and then, in the end, you're supposed to feel great because someone said some amazing thing. And the whole point of saying something amazing is that you're saying something amazing because the person you lost is now someone else's hero. I got that message on Memorial Day. The sentiment was in my head on Friday. I was still working hard in Cleveland to get myself through the memorial service for Melissa Feren, the woman I lost in September. Two weeks after my husband, Rob, and I buried Melissa and her mother, Carol, we were at a dinner party at the home of a friend. We were drinking, and we got to talking about the Redskins, and the band, and the birthday party for Melissa, and the time I took Rob to the airport. And I was telling the story about when I was little and I used to play house with my dolls, and it was just so much fun. At some point during the storytelling, Rob's eyes began to water. He doesn't cry much. Sometimes he gets down on his knees, takes off his glasses, and fixes them on his nose because he can't bear to take them off. He gets overwhelmed. He feels guilty about crying in front of people. So
