XX TirsoThis invention relates to a video input system which forms the basis of an interactive television system. More particularly, the invention relates to such a video input system in which only one television camera is used to receive video signals from an information source. The invention has particular, but not exclusive, application to a video input system which forms part of an interactive television system. It is known to provide an interactive television system which allows customers to select video programmes which are transmitted to their homes. In an interactive television system, customers use a control, such as a television remote control, to select video programmes which are to be transmitted to their homes. When a programme has been selected, the control may allow the customer to set parameters for the transmitted programme (for example by allowing the customer to select a channel, and to select a programme name for the transmitted programme). It is also known to provide a video input system which connects a television camera to an information source to receive video signals from the information source. The video signals are processed and then used to provide a television programme which is transmitted to a receiver. One such system is described in WO-A-97/17748. The system provides a large number of channels of video programming which may be accessed by a user via the control. The remote control allows a customer to select a single video programme which is to be broadcast from the information source. Consequently, it is not known to allow the remote control to select different parts of a video programme for broadcasting. This is especially difficult if the customer selects a video programme which is comprised of different video signals, such as a news programme. It is an object of the present
