"I don't see this race," said Rushad Khalfan Muhktar, 35, an Aleppo resident who has been enduring a five-year siege of his hometown since the summer of 2012. "I believe in all the freedom and democracy. I don't know what's going to happen. All we can do is watch it." Mr. Muhktar, a construction worker, said he still feels loyalty toward the government he has never seen. He has received no compensation for the loss of his relatives or for the damage to his home, which is pockmarked by shell fragments. He said he wanted to keep his two children out of politics, but he worried that the opposition's radicalism could overwhelm him. Many residents here felt similarly about the political situation in the northern Syrian city of Aleppo, which has been divided in two by the government and the rebels since July 2012. While the city has been divided into zones controlled by each side, the people have borne the brunt of the fighting, with residents and refugees afraid to move from one side to the other. Many young men have disappeared, mostly into detention, Mr. Muhktar said, and a number of "free Syrians" had been killed in the city recently by stray mortar rounds or rebel bullets, after the opposition took control of the outskirts of Aleppo last year. In all, more than a quarter of a million people have been killed in Syria since the beginning of the uprising, according to the United Nations. Last month, both sides agreed to a nationwide ceasefire, following several months of relative peace in the city of Homs. Over the past week, the monitors have said, they could not confirm the start of the truce; the monitors do not have the manpower to verify the government's and opposition's compliance with the deal. If the violence continues, it would be the first time in months that the monitors have been unable to track the situation in a city, let alone call it an escalation or a withdrawal.
