In most parts of the country, the natural phenomena of thawing and refreezing are usually centered in the far north. But in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, the opposite is true. Here, the semi-arid state is experiencing several thaws followed by sudden, record-setting freezes. This unusual phenomenon has been well-documented by the National Weather Service. But it seems the effect of these cooling dips is most evident in a specific area: Beer. An ice cold pint Although the well-known beer drought of recent years is now a thing of the past, the Michigan Brewers Guild reported brewers were selling 6.2 percent fewer craft beers in 2014 than in 2013, a number that is still trending downward. Michigan State University Extension Associate Professor Jeff Currie's take on the drop in craft beer production: "Michigan was in the top five states for craft beer production for years and that just seems to have gone away." Why did so many craft brewers leave? Dave Campbell, a partner in the Traverse City-based production brewery Grand Traverse Brewing Company, explains Michigan's craft beer industry suffered from slow growth and insufficient marketing. "For a long time, Michigan has been underrepresented in the craft beer industry," Campbell said. "So when breweries start popping up and they're all based in metro Detroit, it becomes that much harder to grow." Grand Traverse Brewing Company, which was founded in 2008, was the first brewery in Michigan since Prohibition. They operate just outside Traverse City and grow some of their own ingredients. But the area is considered one of the best craft beer producing regions in the world. The next closest is Oregon's Willamette Valley. "A lot of the reason we have such a good climate is because our water is so clean," said Campbell. "We don't have huge rainfall amounts, but our climate allows for very clean water." But that clean water has its negative effect on the
