This paper demonstrates a new approach to complex biological modelling, which explicitly deals with the combinatorial complexity of protein complex formation in living cells. Previous studies are only able to extract rules for reasoning on protein complexes from a specific database of protein complexes, and not from biological information about the cellular environment. On the other hand, the present approach combines heuristic programming and posterior sampling to allow abstraction from the resulting protein complexes. The simplicity and efficiency of the present approach is demonstrated with a simple model for protein complex formation in yeast cells. The proposed approach may therefore be applicable to a range of other biological models.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a heat exchanger and a water heater for, for
