The proposal for a new plan to fund Social Security was formally announced by Bush in June. But the new plan, which would make undocumented immigrants eligible for Social Security benefits, is at the center of increasing tension between the White House and Congress. Since the announcement, many Democratic politicians have condemned the plan. And now House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has also spoken out against the proposal. Pelosi told the Los Angeles Times that the proposal's "moral and political issues make it very difficult for the president to move forward." Pelosi said "the [Bush] administration has not cleared this with Congress, and it's not getting a hearing" on the issue. She added: "Are you out of your mind?" The White House has strongly defended the controversial new plan, but recently had to defend a legal opinion it issued last month indicating that the government does not have to comply with federal laws and regulations on illegal immigration. According to the White House, the Social Security administration has the authority to rule that undocumented immigrants are eligible for benefits without the federal government having to enforce the nation's immigration laws. "This is not a question about policy, this is a question of prosecutorial discretion," an anonymous White House official told the New York Times. Several immigration advocacy organizations have also spoken out against the plan, saying it would mean that the Social Security Administration would be violating federal laws. The National Council of La Raza said that the proposal "puts money into programs that are intended to help American citizens ... and makes little to no sense."
