Specific and effective measures to enhance muscle mass remain lacking, highlighting the need for new research to identify potential therapies.Objective: The primary objective was to determine the effectiveness of nutritional supplementation, resistance training, or the combination of both on increasing muscle mass in patients undergoing dialysis.Design: Systematic review and meta-analysis.Methods: The primary outcome measure was lean muscle mass, defined as the ratio between weight in kilograms and squared height in meters. Electronic databases (PubMed, EMBASE, Cochrane Library) were searched from inception until May 2015. Studies of adults on maintenance dialysis were included. The quality of the selected studies was evaluated. The searches yielded 3,480 records. After removing duplicates, screening, and data abstraction, 15 studies were included. Random effects model was used for meta-analysis. Results: Muscle strength, quality of life, muscle strength, physical function, and mortality were all increased in the exercise group, compared with the control group. Lean muscle mass was increased in both exercise and nutritional groups, compared with the control group, but the difference was not statistically significant. Conclusion: Aerobic exercise and nutritional supplementation both increased muscle strength, physical function
