The final countdown of NASA's Mars Sample Return (MSR) mission is on track to launch in July, and the samples are beginning to roll. On June 12, 2018, NASA successfully delivered its last of the four return capsules for the MSR mission - capsule #C-CRLV-19A - to Jet Propulsion Laboratory in California. Each of the return capsules will hold thousands of Martian samples that were collected during NASA's 2012 and 2013 Mars rover missions. The samples collected on the surface will be transferred to the interior of the MSR spacecraft, where they will remain sealed until they are returned to Earth 50 years from now. [Photos: NASA's Mars Mission in Pictures] In April, NASA reported to the space agency's Advisory Council for Science Policy (ACSP) that the mission is on track to launch in July 2018. The agency also successfully test-fired two of the cryogenic engines that will provide propulsive power for the spacecraft during its landing. The MSR mission will collect core samples from roughly two-thirds of the rover
