A case-control study was carried out in seven pre-pubertal children with phenylketonuria and eight healthy controls of similar age. The mean \pm SD of the p50, the amount of hematocrit required to impart 50% of the maximum deformability, was significantly lower in patients with phenylketonuria (5.1 \pm 0.8 microl) than in controls (7.5 \pm 0.7 microl) (p less than 0.001). Blood viscosity at a shear rate of 150/s, which is known to be rate-dependent, was significantly higher in patients with phenylketonuria (3.9 \pm 0.5 mPa.s) than in controls (2.8 \pm 0.4 mPa.s) (p less than 0.02). There was a significantly positive correlation between the values of p50 and blood viscosity at 150/s in patients with phenylketonuria ($r = 0.83$; p less than 0.005), and the values of p50 were significantly lower in patients with worse metabolic control, i.e., higher levels of phenylalanine and lower levels of tyrosine ($r = 0.58$; p less than 0.05). These results show that red blood cells of patients with phenylketonuria are markedly affected in respect to deformability. This may be related to increased blood viscosity and affect the microcirculation in phenylketonuria and should be considered in the development of therapeutic strategies. //  // * // * Copyright (C) 2013 International Business Machines // * Corporation and others.
