eKalappai Screenshots: The present invention relates to the manufacture of apertured films from nonwoven webs of meltblown fibers and/or thermally bonded nonwoven webs of meltblown fibers, and in particular to a binderless apertured film obtained from such nonwoven webs. Films prepared from apertured nonwoven webs have been known for several years and are currently used as disposable non-woven fabrics for use in garments, such as disposable diapers, adult incontinence garments, bedding, medical apparel, etc. The apertured nonwoven fabrics used in such disposable applications are generally prepared by bonding a nonwoven web composed of meltblown fibers or fibers produced by other airlaid processes to a porous substrate web composed of airlaid fibers and/or staple fibers. The apertured nonwoven fabric is subsequently cut into the desired shape. However, in the preparation of nonwoven fabrics, many processes are used to produce the nonwoven webs. For example, in the preparation of nonwoven webs, aqueous or organic polymer dispersions can be applied to the web of fibers, typically by coating, spraying, or slotting, to effect the bonding of the polymer particles to the fibers and to each other to form a coherent nonwoven web. Many of the apertured nonwoven fabrics that are currently in use in disposable articles are prepared by coating a nonwoven web with an aqueous binder containing a plasticizer, such as poly(ethylene glycol), which is subsequently dried to form the apertured nonwoven fabric. A problem with such a process is that the film has a relatively high roughness due to the inclusion of the binder. The roughness of the film can negatively impact the wettability of the fabric when it is being used in a disposable article, and can also affect the aesthetics of the fabric.
